Theme of the Conference

Gandhiji's educational model was not only holistic and practical, it was highly decentralized and integrated, with a demonstrated capacity to motivate the entire community. Since the system of Western education had little use for the masses, there were inadequate facilities for children aged between 6-11 years as well as poor enrolment. In many ways the situation hurts the girls more than the boys. Gandhiji, who viewed education as an investment in human capital, warned against this system because it disorganized villagers, made them helpless and paralyzed and steadily sunk them into poverty, unemployment and despair. Based on his wisdom and successful experiments with education in South Africa, he put forth a Basic Education Plan which had the merit of achieving one aim of peace and freedom, for which all mankind yearns today. Also, recognizing the futility of a centralized plan and control in implementing programmes, he also outlined a comprehensive but decentralized model to be implemented by the village Republics. The vital objective of his model was to develop productive and social skills among the masses.

Gandhiji believed that Languages are not just means of communication but represent the very fabric of cultural expressions, the carriers of identity, values and world views. A guiding principle of cultural diversity is to continue to strengthen and maintain the diversity of languages. In spite of the differences of races and religions, one should learn to tolerate and respect one another and consider all human beings as children of one God and, therefore, brothers and sisters of one another. God is the Creator of all life; all his creatures are, therefore, equal in His eyes. Humanity is a gigantic tree having innumerable branches and leaves, and the same life throbs through them all. The realization of unity in diversity is implied in the removal of untouchability.

The largest thing Gandhiji is well known for throughout the world is his contributions to society. He strongly believed that his Indian people deserved equal rights and better living conditions. All of his revolutions and movements were contributions to society. The largest of his contributions was the Indian independence. By himself, he started a movement with thousands of followers using non-violent tactics. He showed us that one can achieve his goals in life without violence, and that violence is never the answer. Gandhiji promoted a very radical socialist ideal of "equal distribution" while articulately separating himself from the "socialist" school, basically because he objected to the means proposed to attain this ideal. The ideal of equal distribution did not, however, involved an equal division of resources among the people. In Gandhi's view, "The real implication of equal distribution is that each man shall have the wherewithal to supply all his needs and no more".
