This might instruct the proudest esteemer of his own parts how useful it is to talk and consult with others, even such as come short of him in capacity, quickness, and penetration; for since no one sees all, and we generally have different prospects of the same thing, according to our different, as I may say, position to it, it is not incongruous to think, nor beneath any man to try , whether another man may not have notions of things which have escaped him, and which his reason would make use of it they came into his mind.

7. Read the following passage and make notes on it: (5)

Everything that men do or think concerns either the satisfaction of the needs they feel or the need to escape from pain. This must be kept in mind when we seek to understand spiritual or intellectual movements and the way in which they develop, for feeling and longing are the motive forces of all human striving and productivity—however nobly these latter may display themselves to us.

What then are the feelings and the needs that have brought mankind to religious thought and to faith in the widest sense? A moment's consideration shows that the most varied emotions stand at the cradle of religious thought and experience.

In primitive people it is, first of all, fear that awakens religious ideas—fear of hunger, of wild animals, of illness and of death. Since the understanding of casual connections is usually limited at this level of existence, the human soul forges a being, more or less like itself, on whose will and activities depend the experiences that it fears. One hopes to win the favour of this being, be deeds and sacrifices, which according to the tradition of the race are supposed to appease the being or to make him well disposed to man. I call this the religion of fear.

This religion is considerably stabilised, though not caused, by the formation of the priestly caste, which claims to mediate between the people and the being they fear, and so attains a position of power. Often a leader or despot will combine the function of the priesthood with its own temporal rule for the sake of greater security; or an alliance may exist between the interests of the political power and the priestly caste.
