13. Case study :

Vishal Components Limited manufactures a wide range of automative components. It has a work force of 1,500 including 250 supervisors and executives is conducted by their respective supervisors annually. The parameters used for performance appraisal are sense of responsibility. Superiors dependability on subordinates, initiative, regularity and punctuality, community activity and potential for development to take higher position. All these factors are given equal weightage. The performance appraisal has 3 objectives. To grant annual increment, to determine profitability promotability and to assess training needs.

In the year 2008 – 2009, some supervisors and executives were not given any increment because as per performance appraisal, their total scores were below standard. The overall low scores were due to community activity and potential for development which were given equal weightage along with other factors. On the stoppage of annual increment the aggrieved supervisors and executives represented their case to the Managing Director of the company and contended that the entire performance appraisal system was faulty. They were very much against the inclusion of community activity and potential for development in the performance appraisal meant for giving pay rise. They argued that all aggrieved supervisors and executives should be given regular annual increment and time-bound promotions. The system would be more objective, fair and free from undue biases.

Questions :

(a) As Human Resource Manager, how will you defend the existing performance appraisal system of the company ? Will you like to incorporate changes, if any ? If yes, what would be these changes and why ?

(b) Should there be separate appraisal criteria for appraising supervisors and executives ? If yes where are such differences needed.
